GALA GONE WILD

It was our big night and everything was going wrong. As plural noun arrived, our volunteers couldn't find any of them on the noun. It was also raining outside and guests were coming in adjective and
adjective.

Then the master of ceremonies was on her way to verb people from the stage and she tripped on a noun and fell on her body part. She completely forgot her speech, and in a panic verb ending in -ed and insulted our guests.

We held out hope for the meal, the music and the adjective auction, but those also were doomed. As the servers emerged from the kitchen with plural noun of food, the smell was adjective. It filled the room with a scent that was a mix of something that smells and something else that smells. Everyone was holding their body part. What else could go wrong?

Maybe tonight wasn't a total loss. The band started playing swing music, which was adjective. It was distracting people from the smell, the rain and the mess at check in. But then we heard the microphone feedback. It sounded like a high-pitched noise that got adjective and adjective. Everyone was covering their ears as well as their noses. I thought, " exclamation!"

People kept leaving. Only a few adjective souls started to bid on our silent auctions items probably because there wasn't much competition left. When I went over to verb the bid sheets I was appalled to find little droplets of blood on each one. Our volunteer had gotten a paper cut putting them out and hadn't realized it. It was like a murder scene.

MORAL OF THE STORY:

Galas may be more hassle than they're worth.
